The miniaturization of electrochemical biosensors requires the use of microfluidic chips. However, the high hydrophobicity of the microfluidic channels and the occurrence of a high dielectric layer at the channel interface are factors that limit the performance of such devices. This paper reports the study of an innovative way to overcome this problem, based on the use of atmospheric pressure plasma jets (APPJs) in order to affect the roughness of the microfluidic channel wall. The optimal geometry and operating conditions of the plasma jet were obtained, and the nature of the changes in surface chemistry were determined. The effects of the plasma treatment and the consequent cleaning of the channels were proven through the evaluation of glucose detection by an amperometric biosensor assembled in the microfluidic channels. The data show that the chamber containing the plasma jet operated in air at atmospheric pressure and at various temperatures does not require a high power input, because the duration of the treatment was found to be sufficient to perform the proposed task. The introduction of a plasma jet was found to be a very efficient method to produce a significant change in the channel roughness, improving the removal of the wall contaminants. The results also show that the microchannels can be restored by the plasma treatment, which increases their
