Iron deficiency anemia is the most prevalent nutrient deficiency worldwide, especially in children. To analyze the occurrence of iron deficiency in Peruvian toddlers, their burden of disease, and the relationship between both factors. A systematic review of published studies was conducted, including scientific articles and proceedings between 1994 and 2018. Prevalence and burden of disease were calculated using selected indicators from the Disease Burden Epidemiology Reference Group (DOBERG) methodology. To analyze the correlation between iron deficiency and the disease burden, studies that used only children aged between six and twelve months were selected, including children younger than this age will not be the focus of the manuscript. From 2792 references, 30 articles were included and the number of studies ranged from 1 to 9 per year. The distribution of the number of studies per year, city, region, and state showed a marked increase in the last four years. Iron deficiency anemia and disease burden in children were considerably high, especially in Lima and coastal areas. Although published studies found a correlation between the occurrence of iron deficiency and the disease burden e79caf774b
