going to London's National Maritime Museum and wandering around wondering what sort of boats would be suitable for the trade winds, the gentle saltmarshes, the steep cliffs, the small inlets and large expanse of water to be met. Much of the cruise, I must confess, was spent gazing at the hulls and mystified as to how any of them worked. Now we're off for another exhilarating adventure. The small group that's coming with us has a little bit more to fill in the blanks - the red pepper in the middle is a friend from a sailing school I've attended a few times; the orange is a US cap'n and ocean-rated skipper; and the purple is a former University of York student that's quite a bit older than the rest of the crew. With a week to find berths and a good deal to be done, we've not packed much and are just off to our meeting point, the Cobham hotel in the seaside town of Ramsgate. Funnily enough, our meals are to be pre-cooked by our host, so it seems that instead of working around a coal fire, we'll be grabbing a takeaway on the go. Crossing the English Channel tomorrow is a momentous occasion and will be the first time since Sydney that we will have been
