Engineered, and integrated human tissues are critical for the advancement of healthcare science and the development of new therapies. Laser-assisted-cavitation micromachining (LAM) has been increasingly adopted as a tool for creating complex three-dimensional (3D) scaffolds that mimic tissue microenvironments. A number of these devices rely on temporary cavitation bubbles that are generated in response to laser pulses (Figure 1). The conventional use of cavitation for tissue engineering is to "mold" plastic scaffolds that provide a replica of the desired tissue microenvironment. The solidification of the liquid phase within the preformed lattice of the meshwork is believed to be the key to mechanotransduction into the substrate and can be used to impart bioactivity to the scaffold surface. The process is also applicable to patterning hydrogels through the forced entrapment of the liquid phase in the polymeric meshwork. When using LAM for tissue
