It is the most common chronic disease among children and more than a quarter of adults who die of the condition are over the age of 40. Neil Lewis, director of the Asthma UK centre for applied research at Southampton University, said: "We are seeing declines in asthma deaths across the UK. "It is a recognition that asthma can be very well managed, that it has a good diagnosis and a good treatment. These things are not just preventative, they are life-saving.
