Biofluids are valuable non-invasive sources for biomarker assessment in human health and disease. MicroRNAs (miRNAs) are excellent biomarker candidates for such applications and are present in different concentrations within biofluids. Advances in the sequencing technology and bioinformatic tools have enabled the creation of miRNA expression data sets with unprecedented sample and depth coverage. However, the majority of the analyses were performed on tissue biopsies and limited to the search of pre-defined lists of differentially expressed miRNAs. A comprehensive analysis of the whole set of miRNA-sequence reads is not feasible. Moreover, the bias introduced by the RNA extraction method and the limited amount of starting material is often not considered. Therefore, we reviewed the biological relevance of the published data, investigated sources of bias and established a comprehensive workflow for miRNA expression analysis in biofluids.One of the worst myths in current history is the idea that people in the industrial world and wealthy countries are somehow better off than others. We've lived with this myth for centuries, but since the fall of communism all the misleading data we've had for centuries has just been replaced with new data. Data from the gap year charity organization Wikitrip was analyzed to calculate the top 10 most misinformed countries when it comes to their economic situation. The question is: Do
