ventricular abnormalities. The most commonly used chamber dimension for the purpose of diagnosing left ventricular hypertrophy is the left ventricular (LV) cavity dimension in diastole. The left ventricular cavity size is calculated from the M-mode tracings of the LV cavity in diastole, and it is expressed in cm. Left ventricular hypertroph, ischemic heart disease Sinus rhythm with normal atrioventricular conduction; normal QRS As with the LV cavity measurement, the posterior wall and interventricular septum thicknesses are also commonly used for the purpose of diagnosing LV hypertrophy. These two thicknesses are measured in diastole by M-mode echocardiography. Routinely using specific symptoms and physical findings, a clinical diagnosis of angina pectoris is confirmed by a positive exercise stress test or an echocardiographic demonstration of coronary artery disease. Sinus rhythm with normal atrioventricular conduction; normal QRS In addition to their proven value in screening for LV hypertrophy, as well as the exclusion of several conditions (such as aortic stenosis, hypertrophic cardiomyopathy, and pericardial disease), chamber measurements can also be used for diagnostic purposes. Conversely, the presence of a left ventricular systolic dysfunction that results in LV dilation can be the most important first-line screening test for LV hypertrophy. The left ventricular cavity dimension, posterior wall and interventricular septum thicknesses should be measured in diastole by M-mode echocardiography in the presence of a systolic dysfunction. Sinus rhythm with normal atrioventricular conduction; normal QRS Left ventricular hypertrophy occurs to a varying degree in more than half of all patients with hypertension. In an otherwise healthy young person, a blood pressure higher than 150/90 mmHg, even in the absence of family history of
