Tuesday. Cloning and characterization of
human and murine
glutathione peroxidase
genes. We have cloned
and characterized the
human and murine
glutathione peroxidase
(GPx) genes encoding

---

two isozymes of GPx, a housekeeping enzyme present in all organisms from bacteria to humans.

The human GPx4 gene encodes a protein of 415 amino acids containing a consensus peroxisomal targeting signal and a Cys-Xaa-Xaa-Cys catalytic motif. The murine GPx1 and GPx4 genes are constitutively expressed at higher levels than the other isozyme, GPx2. The signal for constitutive expression is conserved in the GPx2 promoter region and the intron sequences between the GPx1 and GPx4 genes.

---

The GPx4 mRNA was detected in all tissues examined, except liver.

In contrast, the GPx1 mRNA was expressed primarily in bone marrow, stomach, and small intestine. A TATA

---

box and multiple consensus sequences typical of tissue-specific genes are present in the 5'-flanking sequences of the GPx1 and GPx4 genes. The deduced amino acid sequences of the human and murine GPx genes are nearly identical, indicating that these sequences are highly conserved during evolution. The amino acid sequence homology between human and murine GPx4 is 79% and that between human and murine GPx1 is about 77%. These high degree of sequence identity coupled with the presence of signal and promotor elements are consistent with the view that GPx1 and GPx4 have evolved from a common gene. Q: How to send message from appengine to microsoft

---

---
