The heat required to achieve the welding is obtained by burning an appropriate material such as rubber interposed between the two sheets of material. It is also known in the art to use a liquid fire-retardant material as part of the friction welding process, and to apply a second layer of a fire-retardant material over the earlier laid layer of fire-retardant material. It is also known to utilize powdered asbestos fibers to help reduce flame propagation (see U.S. Pat. No. 4,609,713 (Roberts et al) and U.S. Pat. No. 4,643,954 (Miura et al)). However, use of asbestos fibers is not desirable for reasons which will be described in more detail below. Regardless of the fire-retardant or fire-proofing material used, the welding process produces two surfaces which have a different fire resistance. One surface, which is exposed to the flame, may have a relatively high fire-resistibility, while the other surface, which is not exposed to the flame, may have a relatively low fire-resistibility. This is sometimes desirable, such as to have the most fire-resistant surface face a fixed object (such as a wall) and the least fire-resistant surface face a movable object (such as a window), or vice versa. In the usual case of lower fire-resistibility on the inside, it is desirable that the exterior surface should be relatively fire-resistible. However, in many uses, the exterior surface will be in contact with moving objects which could be harmed by the more fire-resistible exterior surface, e.g., the exterior surface may need to maintain heat and workable strength while being exposed to a flame. With this in mind, it has been found that a composite material is 0cc13bf012

Nuclear androgen receptor in endometrium of infertile patients with type I Müllerian duct anomalies. Nuclear androgen receptors were determined in endometrium from infertile patients with different aetiologies of female infertility, including Müllerian duct anomalies (MDA) (obliteration of the Müllerian ducts) and hyperplasia of endometrial glands. It was shown that in patients with Müllerian duct anomalies, the number of endometrial nuclear androgen receptors was decreased when compared with women in the same age group with normal endometrium. Mental health services in Ibadan, Nigeria. In Nigeria, health services for mental illness are limited. The aims of this paper were to identify types of mental health services available in Ibadan, to describe the scope of services, and to describe the sources of funding. Structured questionnaires were used to gather data on the availability of mental health services in three public hospitals and the non-governmental organisation Institute of Human Development, Ibadan. The main problems in mental health service provision were shortages of trained staff, inadequate resources and patient reception problems. This study has shown that
