Scientific and clinical problems in the management of hepatocellular carcinoma. There are few therapeutic options for patients with hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC). Five-year survival is best in patients with small tumors (diameter less than or equal to 5 cm) and normal serum alpha-fetoprotein (AFP) levels. The conventional approach of treatments for advanced disease is limited to supportive care, or alternatively, to palliative orthotopic liver transplantation. The small percentage of patients with HCC who can tolerate a transplant have better median survival than those not transplanted. Unfortunately, this group of patients is severely limited by organ shortages and morbidity, and long-term results are not encouraging. Recently, the use of prodrugs with low activation profiles and optimization of hepatic arterial administration of cytotoxic agents have shown promise for improved response rates in HCC. Many patients with early or intermediate stage HCC are good candidates for ablative therapies, with a 40-50% chance of long-term survival. Patients with small lesions (diameter less than or equal to 5 cm) and normal AFP are most likely to survive long-term following therapies that produce a normal, well-contoured tumor 6d1f23a050
