Acquire Reading Rights To Your Materials Manage Reading Lists. to translate laboratory findings into clinical outcomes of treatment in experimental diabetes. The treatment of diabetes mellitus with non-insulin antihyperglycemic agents (NIAs) has shown a higher efficacy than that of insulin. This is due to the fact that insulin is a potent factor that counterbalances the detrimental effect of diabetes on the cardiovascular system, exerting arterial blood pressure-lowering and antiatherosclerotic effects. In contrast, the NIAs are not cardioprotective agents and their beneficial effect in the cardiovascular system seems to be limited. Despite the clearly beneficial effects of insulin on the cardiovascular system, newer drug treatments have raised a tremendous question on the real clinical benefit they offer. In fact, the translation of laboratory studies into clinical outcomes of treatment with the NIAs is still in its infancy. We aimed to discuss the role of insulin treatment in the prevention of cardiovascular disease as well as the potential and actual clinical benefit of a novel antihyperglycemic agent that is currently being developed (BMS-536924).
