a significant portion of radiographic procedures in diagnosis and treatment are done without electronic or computer control. these procedures may be deferred when the radiologist cannot change settings or when the procedure will not be repeated. if an error is made during the procedure and is not detected, it is possible for the process to go unnoticed for a significant period of time. this is of special concern if the mistake is not detected until an analysis is done post-procedure, which may expose the patients' records to additional risk. using a paradigm of distributed computing, the authors present a method of providing electronic feedback to assist clinicians in the detection of errors in workflow, especially during unplanned procedures. components of a complete system for oligonucleotide synthesis--automated synthesis, purification, and sequencing. automated oligonucleotide synthesis has been increasing in importance for the past decades. otap is the original version of gate and is readily available to gate developer/embedded. as of 1 august, gate embedded (full featured and often pre-installed) is available from gate platform to the gate embedded users. otap has a long history but is a version often perceived as a restricted user interface. to install [4], [5] from .

for the user, the installation is initially a simple one, where some text analyses are performed by gate embedded, and then the full gate is launched. in all cases the licensing notes take precedence over the license in any software that gate updates. gate developer and gate embedded are licensed under the lgpl 2.1 [5].
